

Why are vaccines tested in different countries?

Some vaccines work better or less well in different populations, so it is important to test it across different countries before deciding whether it is safe and effective for global use.

The levels of transmission of the virus are also different between countries.

Where there is a lot of virus transmission, it is easier to test whether the vaccine works.

